Bruges. The capital of West Flanders is an ancient city, referred to under its present name, which means "Bridges," as early as the seventh century. In the thirteenth century it ranked with Ypres and Venice as a great commercial centre, and monopolized the trade with England. Its wealth was so conspicuous that a queen remarked the rich attire of its citizens. Its quiet streets and antiquated buildings, its pictures, its Belfry, its Carillon are all well known to English tourists.
